LeJeune-class starships were first introduced in 2275 following the destruction of Starbase 27. This class vessel has served Starfleet in transporting and deploying Starfleet Marines throughout Federation space. The type of ship can transport up to 10,000 Starfleet Marines under emergency conditions, but usually provides transportation for 4,000 or less as needed.

Excelsior-class starships were first introduced in 2284 as “The Great Experiment,” meaning that the vessel was to have been equipped with transwarp drive. While the drive simply didn’t deliver the velocities hoped for, it was an improvement over the speed records of the Constitution-class, and the stability of the design, the long-range capability of the starship, and the extreme maneuverability (despite the seemingly gangly design), resulted in this starship class (and its Enterprise variant) replacing the aging Constitution-class fleet.

Enterprise-variant starships, based on the successful Excelsior-class, were first introduced in 2294. They are deep space explorers in that they can operate for many years without resupply or repair at a starbase. Many of these ships were involved in the exploration of the galactic rim and the Beta quadrant.
